

Book Review

Law and the Doctor. Third edition. Sunila Sharma. Paras Medical Publisher, New Delhi, 2023. 476pp, price not mentioned. ISBN 978-81-8191-549-8.

This book provides information on the numerous acts and pertinent legal provisions that every medical professional should be aware of. It is the need of the hour with rising public awareness and doctors now covered by the Consumer Protection Act. It is crucial for doctors to be aware of specific sections of several acts that are important to our daily practice due to the rise in cases involving medical negligence. The effort to include various case studies and judgments relating to various medical specialties is commendable.

The identification and reporting of diverse medicolegal cases have been explained. Legal disputes between different medical specialties have been discussed, citing several instances and their judgments. The author has succeeded in addressing the various practice-related issues that can give rise to allegations of negligence. The author has worked hard to identify the many hazards and how to avoid them by including a variety of cases from various specialties, complaints against personnel from various medical specialties and judicial rulings. Various medical and legal aspects of the injured victim are taken into account. In addition, the author has stressed the value of proper documentation and its storage. Many parts of research and law have been briefly discussed, along with guiding principles for research. A brief overview of medicolegal autopsy procedures and recommendations for conducting postmortem examination have been included.

This book will be a useful resource for all medical professionals to help them identify and avoid problems related to their practice. The contents of this book are explained in clear and simple language. Typically challenging topics are addressed in an approachable way. I advise medical professionals in all specialties to read this book to expand their present understanding of the current topics. The book will be useful not only for practising medical professionals but also for lawyers and undergraduates.

SANJEEV LALWANI

Department of Forensic Medicine

All India Institute of Medical Sciences, New Delhi, India

drsanjeevlalwani@gmail.com

[To cite: Lalwani S. Law and the doctor (Book Review). Natl Med J India 2024;37:166. DOI: 10.25259/NMJI_695_2023]

How the Light Gets In. Ashok Alexander. Penguin Random House, Gurugram. 364pp, ₹599. ISBN: 978-0-670-09421-9.

‘These kinds of challenges can only be solved by women who live with the problems everyday.’ This personal belief inspired The Antara Foundation (TAF). A non-governmental organization nurtured by Ashok Alexander, TAF works on maternal and child health. This book is a chronicle of TAF’s journey, in delivering solutions to improve maternal and child health outcomes, among India’s poorest populations. It is also a narrative of the personal transformation of the author, Ashok Alexander, from a senior partner at McKinsey & Company, to the creator of a grassroots entity operating in remote rural India.

Before starting TAF, Ashok Alexander had established Avahan, an HIV/AIDS prevention programme for the Gates Foundation, which is credited with averting over 6 lakh (0.6 million) HIV infections. Much of the author’s work with Avahan entailed understanding the world of sex workers in India. He draws parallels between sex workers and village mothers in remote rural India. Both are utterly marginalized, and have little control over their own lives. With others making vital decisions regarding their lives, both live in tough environments, in a struggle for survival.

The book has three parts, Conception, Child, and Adult, describing the evolution of TAF in its work in rural and tribal areas of Rajasthan and Madhya Pradesh. ‘Conception’ sets out describing ‘faded blossoms’—a poignant account of young mothers, their severely malnourished (often female) children, and the sheer disregard for their needs. It is the author’s dream to be able to prevent such morbid conditions, and mortality, in mothers and children. The naïve assumption that his track record with Avahan would open doors, and provide access to willing donors for TAF, soon disintegrates. There is a painful cognizance that fundraising has put him on the other side of the fence. Experiences with potential donors range from those with strings attached, to those that were truly disappointing. Experiences with the bureaucracy are a mixed bag. Reprieve comes from the Tata Trusts. His mentor in Avahan, Bill Gates, continues to be his lodestar. Vasundhara Raje Scindia, then Chief Minister of Rajasthan, provides vital support for TAF’s maternal and child health programme in partnership with the state government. The author wryly concedes that, by sticking to his dream, he has become something of a zealot. It has been a struggle to give life to his dream, he sometimes wonders how he did it, but never why.

In the second part of the book, TAF, birthed after a long and arduous effort, now enters its childhood in Rajasthan. With a mission to ensure that no woman would die giving birth, that every infant would survive and grow up healthy, TAF embarked on an ambitious task. It is clear that the team would have to move closer to the women who live with these problems, learn from them, and work with them in equal